Dissertation

My dissertation explores group relations in geographic space and is guided by a central question: what happens when out-groups enter or attempt to enter homogeneous spaces dominated by a single group? How do these dominant groups respond to the perceived threat of "others"? In the first study which was published last year in the American Political Science Review, I leverage a unique historical event, the migration of large numbers of black Southerners into California during the Second Great Migration (1940s-1960s), to estimate the effects of rapid demographic change on white voting. The second study investigates a previously unexplored vehicle for racial threat, new mass transit (NMT). NMT provides rapid and affordable arterial connections between segregated communities, potentially generating inter-group contact in communities that previously experienced very little. The study proposes that support for public goods can be shaped by this prospective group threat. I find evidence for this theory using voting data from a 1962 bond vote in San Francisco County that would provide funds for the Bay Area Rapid Transit (BART) system and facilitate the entry of black East Bay residents into primarily white inner-ring suburbs of San Francisco. The third project, which is scheduled for Fall 2019, plans to leverage an original lab experiment with UCLA students to examine how various types of intergroup contact—passive versus intensive, in-group versus out-group—shape attitudes about multiculturalism and behavior.
